Teaching the Basic Skills:
The big job of the world is to bring up its youngsters so that an atomic age will be a blessing and not a curse. This means that there must be among mankind a widespread respect for the individual and a willingness to cooperate with other people.

Skills in the art of living together are basic. They are learned as much by how we teach as by what we teach.

Introducing the issue is an article describing the goals to which education needs to dedicate itself and the kind of functional teaching through which these goals may be reached.

Practical discussions of teaching basic skills from nursery school through college show how the learning of any "subject" may become a vehicle for learning the larger job of social living. These articles illustrate problems of learning and possibilities for improved practices.

Contributors are Alice Miel, Irene Ahlborn, Dorothy Gray, Lulu Barton, Lawrence G. Thomas, Helen E. Streit, Mildred Sheppard, and Louise E. Weaver.

Departments of the journal bring readers news and views of current thought and action in the field of education.
