Experiments in Curriculum Development: What's happening in curriculum in other cities, in other states? How is a teacher in Maine or a principal in Minnesota solving a problem, conducting a study?

Next month's magazine brings you a picture of curriculum experimentation throughout the country. Leading off is a discussion of recent outstanding programs in the light of their implications for the future.

Successive articles discuss current programs in Wisconsin, Maine, and Utah. One author reports on the recent Hawaiian school survey and another on the curriculum study centering in the University of Montana.

A description of experimentation in Minnesota illustrates a type of approach which might be used in small American communities. Two articles tell of the activities of the Sloan and Rosenwald foundations. Also in this issue is a review of the much-discussed Harvard report on general education.
