Supervision—An Adventure in Human Relationships: New methods of this important function are being constantly evaluated and tried out by thoughtful school personnel.

Next month's issue will outline some of the results of these appraisals and programs, with emphasis on the supervisor and his responsibility in effecting desirable relationships.

Teachers' reactions to aspects of supervision which improve or constitute barriers to effective human relations are highlighted in one section of the magazine. These statements are featured in Our Readers Say, the new department of the Journal this year.

Other accounts call attention to the need for encouraging and stimulating teachers through commendation rather than criticism; many of the merits to be found in a supervisory program at a naval training station which can be effective in civilian education; and the development of professional stature in the field of social studies which will recognize the need for increased sensitivity in working with children.
