Education’s New Era
The COVID-19 pandemic—along with concurrent societal tensions and inequities—has had profound and likely lasting implications for schools. This issue will explore what comes next for K–12 education, examining how schools are recovering and building on lessons learned. What gaps has the pandemic exposed in education? What possibilities and new pathways has it opened up?

Compassionate Discipline
“My humanity is bound up in yours, for we can only be human together,” said Nobel Peace Prize winner Desmond Tutu. What does it look like to take a human-centered, whole child approach to classroom management? To emphasize care over control, skill-building over finger-pointing, and prevention over emotional reactivity? Key areas of emphasis in this issue will be proactive approaches to social-emotional learning and strategies to get to the root of—and respond to—challenging behaviors.

Cultivating Educator Efficacy
Educator efficacy is a self-fulfilling prophecy: The more a teacher believes in his or her ability to positively impact student learning, the more he or she will do so and feel a sense of thriving in the profession. This issue will explore how schools can strengthen educators’ and leaders’ sense of efficacy—through instructional improvement initiatives, coaching, collaborative professional learning approaches, data collection, cultural competence, and culture-building strategies.

Engage and Motivate!
When students are engaged in learning, they reap many benefits, including deeper learning, higher achievement, and greater self-efficacy. This issue will highlight evidence-based techniques and strategies to increase motivation and engagement in today’s classrooms. This issue will also speak to the effects that the pandemic and remote learning have had on student motivation.

Equity Every Day
Teaching—and leading—for equity is an ongoing process. There is no “peak” to reach, no flag to plant. Equity isn’t just an initiative; it’s a way of being and leading. This issue will seek to unpack how racism, sexism, ableism, classism, and other marginalizing ideologies can be woven into the fabric of classrooms, schools, and districts and, conversely, how schools can extricate themselves from these patterns through conscious actions and systemic changes.

The Adaptive Leader
Change and challenge are constants in education. School leaders today need to be agile and ready for anything. This issue will look at the mindsets and traits of adaptive school leaders, those who are best able to lead through change. How do these leaders make decisions, communicate with stakeholders, and ensure the primacy of effective teaching and learning? What support systems and training do they need?

Feedback for Impact
As the late Grant Wiggins wrote, “less teaching plus more feedback is the key to achieving greater learning.” This is as true for educators as it is for the students we work with. In this issue, we will explore the key characteristics of effective, actionable feedback—whether provided in the classroom, following a teacher observation, or during a coaching conversation—and how schools can create cultures of effective feedback and make the most of feedback for growth.

Ready for the Real World?
College and career readiness has long been an aspirational focus of schools. But with so much variability in students’ postsecondary options and pathways, that preparation can be a tall and continually shifting task. This issue will examine how educators can better support students in navigating a multilayered system of postsecondary choices and directions, including through college preparation; career and technical education (including STEM-focused programs); apprenticeships and internships; and financial and vocational information programs.
